In this final chapter, Lasswell entreats readers to recognize that the object of the three-volume series has been to understand the past not in order to foretell the future but in order to increase awareness of opportunities for reshaping communications technology. Thus, he sees the future as a "policy problem" which calls for specifying goals, reexamining trends, and inventing and applying optimal policies. To this end, Lasswell proposes several hypotheses that might direct future inquiries and policies.

"The Interconnections of Political Power, Psychotherapy, and World Community." Political Communication and Persuasion 1 (1981): 107-125.

This paper, a plenary address at the 1975 meeting of the American Psychoanalytic Association, investigates the role of psychotherapy in relation to political power. Examples of how psychotherapy currently serves political power include the confinement of dissenters, therapy for combatants in war, cooptation to the ends of security officials, and defense of order through counterattacks on political deviants. Lasswell suggests that psychotherapy can instead use political power to serve its own goals and prevent global disaster. He then outlines five strategies for professional action open to psychotherapists as ways of influencing policy and helping prevent war.
